1. Describe the main problem in the situation.

Look for:

- Identifies the central situation rather than judging the person.

One possible response: A pretend group can submit work quickly or take time to check a confusing section. There is still enough time to review.

2. Name one possible feeling. What detail supports it?

Look for:

- Names a plausible feeling.
- Uses context; different reasonable feelings are acceptable.

One possible response: Members may feel impatient or concerned.

Open responses use criteria and an illustrative response. Other well-supported responses can be acceptable.
